GIN STYLES

- Genever - the original predecessor to all other gin - originally created by the the Flemish and traditionally made from distilled malt wine. Flavoured with juniper and can be aged or unaged.
- London Dry Gin - the most popular style and can be produced anywhere in the world. Must contain juniper and can generally have many additional botanicals added. No sugars to be added as the finish must be dry on the palate.
- Old Tom Gin - originally developed in England and influenced from the original Dutch style of Genever. Star anise, lemon peel, sweet liquorice and later sugar where added to mask the early days of production and the poor quality of the distillation process.
- Sloe Gin - a London Dry gin infused with tart and astringent Sloe berries after the distillation process, giving this gin an intense red colour and even more of a vibrant flavour profile and noted acidity.
- Pink Gin - a London Dry gin infused with bitters, traditionally served in any cocktail that requires Gin and bitters, as well as the famous Pink Gin and Tonic cocktail.
- Modern Gin - some producers have decided to move away from traditional standards of gin making and incorporate a host of new and unique botanicals in the gin making process. Some have taken this a step further and added further botanicals post distillation infusions to ensure a more vibrant and clearly defined flavour profile.

- The “Old Tom” style of gin dates back to the 18th century, when the addition of sugar gave balance to some of the harsher spirits of the time. Uncertainty surrounds the origins of the name, but the image of a tomcat was common on barrels and pub signs. The style lies somewhere between Dutch Genever and London Dry. Old Tom became less popular as distillation techniques improved in the 19th century, allowing for the production of “light” spirits, but it has recently enjoyed a resurgence. KI NO TOU is based on an exclusive bottling – believed to Japan’s first Old Tom – created by The Kyoto Distillery for the Tokyo International Bar Show (TIBS). It takes our classic KI NO BI Kyoto Dry Gin and sweetens it post-distillation with kokuto (literally “black sugar”) from the Okinawan island of Yonaguni. Dating back to the 17th century, kokuto is made in such a way that it retains a higher mineral content than other sugars. As well as sweetness, it adds complexity.

We start by using our award- winning vodka, 34-times distilled for smoothness, as a base before a complex collection of herbs and berries are blended during distillation for maximum flavor. The depth, complexity and recognizable taste in our Nordic Dry comes from thyme and basil blending with juniper – all three create the distinctive, herbaceous note known as beta- myrcene. But when you add the unique overtones of lingonberry, European blueberries and ingredients such as lavender, the spirit becomes something else, and uniquely Purity.
